The renowned British novelist ' s " casual and wittily acute guidance " on reading—and writing—great fiction (Harper ' s). Renowned for such classics as A Room with a View, Howards End, and A Passage to India, E. M. Forster was one of Britain ' s—and the world ' s—most distinguished fiction writers, a frequent nominee for the Nobel Prize in Literature. In this collection of lectures delivered at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1927, he takes a wide-ranging look at English-language novels—with specific examples from such masters as Dickens and Austen—discussing the elements they all have in common. Using a witty, informal tone and drawing as well on his extensive readings in French and Russian literature, Forster discusses his ideas in reference to such figures as Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Proust; explains the difference between “ flat ” and “ round ” characters and between plot and story; and ultimately provides an “ admirable and delightful ” education for anyone who appreciates the art of a good book (The New York Times).
